Crisis Counseling and Mental Health Treatment Sin and Differences

Newsroom

Note: This is the second in a series of program guidance documents de ensure consistency in addressing key program issues in the Crisis Cour Training and Assistance Program (CCP). The Crisis Counseling Training Assistance Program is funded by the Federal Emergency Management. (FEMA) under the authority of the Robert T. Stafford Disaster Relief an Emergency Assistance Act. On behalf of FEMA, the Center for Mental H Services (CMHS), Emergency Services and Disaster Relief Branch (ESL provides technical assistance, program guidance and oversight.

Purpose

This program guidance outlines the similarities and differences betwee counseling and mental health treatment in the context of the FEMA/CM Counseling Assistance and Training Program (CCP). It describes the so limitations of crisis counseling services and identifies key questions age counselors should consider when deciding whether to refer an individual health treatment services.

What is Crisis Counseling?

For over twenty five years, the Crisis Counseling Program has supporte term interventions with individuals and groups experiencing psycholog sequelae to large scale disasters. These interventions involve the coun of assisting disaster survivors in understanding their current situation (reactions, assisting survivors in reviewing their options, providing emo support, and encouraging linkages with other individuals and agencies help survivors recover to their pre-disaster level of functioning. The as focused upon helping disaster survivors cope with their current situatic there are contradictory indications, the program draws upon the assur the individual is capable of resuming a productive and fulfilling life follo disaster experience if given support, assistance, and information at a t a manner appropriate to his or her experience, education, developmen and culture.

The goal of crisis counseling is to assist individuals in coping with the psychological aftermath of the disaster, mitigate additional stress or ps harm, and to promote the development of understanding and coping s that individuals may be able to call upon in the future. While always co those with special needs, the thrust of the Crisis Counseling Program s inception has been to serve people responding normally to an abnormal experience. By serving such a broad spectrum of people, the program encourage the use of mental health services by reducing discriminatior stigma associated with receiving them.

What is Mental Health Treatment?

In contrast to the crisis counseling services provided through the CCP, health treatment, as typically defined within the mental health commu implies the provision of assistance to individuals for an existing pathological condition or disorder. In this context, it involves providing a variety of interventions following the assignment of a diagnosis consistent with tl recent edition of the Diagnostic and Statistical Manual published by the Psychiatric Association or another similar assessment tool. This diagno following an evaluation and/or psychological testing by a licensed men professional. Typically, the mental health professional and client will di various treatment options and agree to certain interventions and treati Common interventions include the treatment of mental disorders, pers reconstruction, development of insight into a wide variety of historical life experiences, and resolution of unconscious conflicts. During treatm provider maintains a documented treatment plan and record. The men professional is licensed by the State and is protected by, and is subject variety of legal matters including malpractice, informed consent to trea confidentiality, and patient/therapist privilege. Since the CCP does not "therapy" in the traditional sense, program managers and outreach wo should assume that their conversations with disaster survivors would r considered "privileged" by a court of law.

The outline below provides a basic description of the differences betwe traditional mental health services and the Crisis Counseling Program. I differences between traditional mental health practice and crisis counsinfluence the way services are provided.

Use of Mental Health Professionals as Crisis Counselors

Training and experience as a mental health professional in the tradition

^{*}Traditional mental health practice takes many forms. These descriptic intended to provide examples for contrast rather than to describe the f traditional mental health practice.

does not guarantee that an individual will be an effective crisis counsel there are numerous examples of mental health professionals who have exceptionally well as crisis counselors, there are also many examples c where this has not been the case. The most effective mental health proserving on crisis counseling teams have the following characteristics:

- They can assimilate a revised conceptualization of mental health that is often different than their training and traditional function. of diagnosis, interventions in very non-traditional settings, role a
- They are comfortable working with paraprofessionals or trained nonprofessionals;
- They are able to incorporate crisis counseling theory and practice theoretical construct that usually guides their practice (e.g. psychoanalytical, cognitive/behavioral, insight oriented approach

Scope of the Crisis Counseling Program

The scope of the crisis counseling program includes the provision of cri counseling services to individuals adversely affected by major disaster addition, it includes provision for training those hired by the crisis cour programs and other community members who may deal with disaster and would benefit from this type of knowledge. Training has proven to critical element of the program, particularly as it assists the crisis coun understanding the scope and boundaries of their roles as well as when appropriate to refer individuals to mental health treatment. Behaviors with generalized anxiety disorder, adjustment disorders, dysthymic dis substance abuse and perhaps eating and phobic disorders are commor after a disaster. Yet, it is suggested that the Crisis Counseling Program coordinators train their outreach workers on how to approach individual may be experiencing such disorders. Asking the following types of querhelp clarify if the counselor should serve or refer the individual:

- Is the condition caused by or clearly exacerbated by the disaster
- Are the crisis counseling staff able to perform an adequate asses this individual and assure that they can defend, in an adverse leg the appropriateness of crisis counseling as opposed to formal tre the intervention of choice?
- Is the program's informal recording of contact notes adequate ar appropriate (as opposed to a formal treatment record) in this case
- Is the mental health system (of which crisis counseling is a part) appropriate and qualified to deal with this problem? Primary heal providers, substance abuse providers, social services, and protect services are examples of other service systems to which crisis consometimes refer.
- Can the counselor appropriately respond to the needs of this per the time, human resource, and skill limitations of the program?

To the extent that these questions are answered in the negative, reference of action. Clearly, making this type of assessment possible referral takes time and appropriate supervision.

This program is intended to supplement State and local mental health private) resources. It is expected that there will be individuals with new outside the scope and duration of the CCP. Cases that fall outside the scrisis Counseling Program should be referred to other agencies that pr mental health treatment. The criteria and methodology for referral sho known throughout the program and consistently applied by the crisis c Supervisors should provide ongoing review of staff activities to assure are consistent with the scope and intent of the Crisis Counseling Program
